

International History Project

The enduring purpose of the International History Project is to generate interdisciplinary research and discussion in international relations and U.S. security policy. It seeks to encourage archival research and publication in diplomatic history, analysis of foreign policy on the basis of theoretical models, and discussion of and reflection on new analytical approaches. Specifically, the International History Project seeks to explore the use of force and diplomacy in international relations, examine political and economic decision-making that affects war and peace, and study the impact of culture and identity on national security. This is accomplished through the Ohio State University Graduate Workshop in International History, the research of Professors Hahn and Lerner, and the continued scholarship of the graduate students in the diplomatic history program. The Mershon Center continues to fund the project and brings many preeminent scholars to present their work at the Center.

Principal Investigators:

Peter Hahn, Professor, History

Mitchell Lerner, Professor, History